

Top Ten EAL Websites

Website address	Description
www.eslflow.com	Lots of sections from beginner to intermediate. Nicely laid out. Ideas for teaching as well as actual resources. Great section on visuals.
www.agendaweb.org	Resources for teaching grammar, plus great interactive books at all levels (scroll down) and listening exercises.
www.eslbase.com	Resources as well as discussion forums, job vacancies and miscellaneous.
http://learnenglishkids.britishcouncil.org/en/	All sorts on here – interactive stories, games, puzzles, blogs, forums. There are also sections for teenagers and adult learners.
http://larryferlazzo.edublogs.org/	Larry's blog is famous in EAL circles. He provides well-researched lists 'the best of'... Up-to-date, punchy comments. Through Larry, I discovered Alberta Math Live and many other great websites. You can also get a monthly newsletter from him.
www.islcollective.org	You have to register, but it's free. There are daily uploaded resources from teachers all over the world. Also resources in MFL. Discussion forums.
www.eslprintables.com	You have to register AND you have to upload your own materials to be able to download – it's based on a points system. Fantastic resources uploaded daily, plus a lively forum. There is also a sister site www.englishexercises.com with interactive exercises for your students. You can register your class, put ready-made exercises on for them or create your own.
http://mes-english.com/	This is a great site. There are top quality flashcards, worksheets, games and templates to make your own stuff. The worksheets are useful for mainstream teachers with EAL kids in the class. There are matching/cloze/handwriting sheets on every topic.
http://www.newslevels.com/	This is a great website. There are topical news stories at every level – starting from 0 – (five pictures with five words to match), going up to advanced. Native English and American speakers read the stories. Exercises on the news items are provided. There is the occasional infelicity of expression, but a really great site that students can work on independently. Also, at advanced level, useful for non-EAL students.
http://resources.woodlands-junior.kent.sch.uk/	This is the most visited UK school website. It's not specifically an EAL site, but the resources – in most subjects - are very useful for EAL students, just as at www.primaryresources.co.uk
